And that's the issue with getting prescription drugs from your doctor. According to a new report from Johns Hopkins Medicine, there will be 2,800 fewer emergency room visits in the United States by 2020, largely due to fewer doctors doing drug testing.. That may have been in the minds of doctors, too. At the beginning of the 1950s, just before the FDA became involved in prescribing drugs for people with severe and life-threatening neurological disease, doctors and pharmacies were doing a great deal more thinking about drug safety versus providing treatment based on medical science. As part of their efforts, they had begun to come up with guidelines specifically for their hospitals — some of which have since become standard practice for many physicians. Today, doctors at hospitals nationwide can often take their pills from the pharmacy aisle without an assistant. They are able to make their own prescription..
